http://www.redmine.org/wiki/redmine/Teams is probably the best starting point since it's basically what we decided on together anyways

I'd like to merge a few of those teams to start. It felt like we split people up too early before there was a need. The "Development" team should be split a bit though, it's such a major section.

Changing this to Release 1.1.0. I'd like to open up the teams to everyone in the community.

Do we really need a "Market Research":/projects/chiliproject/wiki/Teams#Market-Research-Team team? That doesn't feel like it fits an open source project at all.

2011-01-18 12:42 am - Niels Lindenthal

Why shouldn't an open source project know what other projects are doing and what our users need? I am sure we need on. This is one aspect that makes our project better than Redmine.

@Eric: As long as it is our goal to keep growing in our market share, it is absolutely necessary to know what is urgently needed and what is not urgently needed. If there are people out there willing to conducts surveys, why should we ignore their results? I mean, if we do not have additional information, we simply do what we think that is right and that might be wrong in some cases.

In my opinion a market research should should analyse bug reports, feature requests and forums and should communicate with to potential and existing new users.

If someone is willing to lead the team and do all of the work for it, that's fine. I just think it feels really out of place, it could just be how it's phrased (feels very "business-speak":http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Business_speak to me).

Whoever wants to be the team leader will need to create and maintain a set of Objectives and Goals that match the main project [[Objectives and Goals]] (every team will need to do this once things are underway).

Eric, please don't worry about business terms. Please feel free to ask. I will lead this team until somebody else wants to take over.
